SELLING SHOTS AT THE ENEMY.

How French Soldiers Increased Their Pay.
When the siege of Paris began and festive little parties of overconfident inhabitants of the city swarmed into the suburbs to the French outposts, there was among the latter a good deal of rivalry in the trade of laying down rugs and tarpaulins for those civilian sharpshooters who bought shots at a franc a shot at the enemy's outposts.
The Germans refused permission for a certain prominent Englishman to pass through their lines from the city on the ground that one of their spies had reported him as having been at the village of Bordeaux, just outside Paris, when the French troops drove a brisk trade in letting out shots, and having spent 20 francs one afternoon in taking chance shots at the German outposts.
The allegation was not denied and no pass was granted.
Surgeon-General Gordon, who represented the medical department of the British army during the war, speaks in a book he wrote of the French outposts making as much as 40 and 50 francs a day each by crying out, "Shots at the enemy, 1 franc!" hundreds of their customers being women. One village, soon to be ravaged by fire and the sword, was like a fair, and the sentries could not sell shots fast enough, for a rich Paris tradesman was standing by offering heavy money prizes for the civilian marksmen who brought down German sentries.—New York
